The Cost-per-Appointment Blueprint for Meta Ads

Work out what you can afford to pay for a booked appointment, choose an offer worth raising a hand for, and set up Meta lead campaigns judged on appointments, not cheap leads.

THE SHORT ANSWER · 65 WORDS

REVIEWED OCTOBER 15, 2026

Facebook and Instagram ads can produce real appointments for a high-value service business when three things line up. You know the most you can pay per booked appointment, you lead with one offer worth raising a hand for, and someone calls every lead within minutes. Judge the campaign on booked and held appointments, because the cheapest leads are often the least likely to show up.

Many owners who say Facebook ads “don’t work” are judging them on the wrong number. A cheap lead goes to voicemail, so the channel looks like junk. An expensive lead gets the campaign switched off before it books anyone.

This guide gives you a better scoreboard: the most you can pay for a booked appointment. Everything else is built to hit it.

Step 1: What can you afford to pay for a booked appointment?

Your ceiling comes from your own numbers, not an industry average. Use the last 12 months. Where you don’t track a number, use an honest guess and mark it.

Line	Your number
Average first-year value of a new client	$
× Gross margin (%) = value of a new client	$
× Close rate from a held appointment (%) = value of a held appointment	$
× Show rate (%) = value of a booked appointment	$
× Share you'll spend on acquisition (%)
= Maximum cost per booked appointment	**$

Use first-year value, not lifetime value. It keeps you safe while you learn what Meta leads actually do.

A worked example. Example numbers, not benchmarks.

- $8,000 first-year value × 50% margin = $4,000 per new client
- $4,000 × 25% close rate = $1,000 per held appointment
- $1,000 × 70% show rate = $700 per booked appointment
- $700 × 30% spend share = $210 maximum cost per booked appointment

Now work backward. If 40% of leads book, this business can pay up to $84 per lead. If only 10% book, it needs leads under $21. A $30 lead that books half the time is cheaper than a $12 lead that almost never does.

- [ ] Fill in the worksheet and circle every guess
- [ ] Post your maximum cost per booked appointment where your team can see it

What this looks like for home improvement companies

Home improvement leads go cold fast. A homeowner with a leaking roof or dead furnace often requests several quotes in one evening, and the first real person to call back gets the first conversation. A good campaign still loses if the phone sits until morning.

The market is steady, not booming. Harvard's Joint Center for Housing Studies projects owner-occupied improvement and repair spending to grow from $509 billion to $518 billion between late 2025 and late 2026 (Harvard JCHS, April 15, 2026). In a flat market, you win by converting more of the leads you already pay for.

A free estimate is the natural offer. A location question saves wasted drives, and a project-type question routes roofing, HVAC and window leads to the right person. Ads that lead with financing need extra care, and solar needs the most (see Step 4).

Step 2: Which offer is worth raising a hand for?

Pick one offer per campaign. It should match how ready the prospect is and never promise a result.

Offer	Fits	Keep it clean
Free on-site estimate	Remodeling, windows, HVAC	Say how long it takes, no obligation
Roof or window inspection	Roofing, windows	No scare claims about unseen damage
Seasonal system check	HVAC	Plain list of what's included
Solar cost walkthrough	Solar	Total cost disclosed, no "free solar"

- [ ] Would a serious prospect find this useful even if they never hire us?
- [ ] Can we deliver it well at the volume a campaign could send?
- [ ] Is the wording free of promised outcomes or savings figures?

Step 3: Lead form or landing page?

Start with Meta's Instant Form set to Higher intent, add one or two multiple-choice qualifying questions, and move to a landing page only if lead quality stays low. Higher intent adds a review screen before submitting. It costs some volume and screens out some accidental taps.

Option	Use it when	Watch out for
Instant Form, More volume	Your team can call everyone fast	Accidental submissions, wrong numbers
Instant Form, Higher intent	You want fewer, more deliberate leads	Slightly higher cost per lead
Either form plus qualifying questions	You need to route by location, timeline or service	More than two questions hurts completion
Landing page	The offer needs explaining, or you want booking on the spot	Needs fast load, clean tracking, short form

Ask only what the first call needs.

Step 4: What are the rules for your category?

Check your category before you build. This is a factual summary, not legal advice.

- Credit. Financing ads may fall under Meta's credit category: age fixed at 18–65+, gender and ZIP targeting restricted, no lookalikes (Meta Marketing API documentation).
- Solar. Disclose total cost and financing terms; don't overstate savings or tax credits (FTC, August 7, 2024).
- Texts and calls (everyone). Prior express written consent is still required for autodialed or prerecorded marketing texts and calls, and since April 11, 2025 opt-outs by any reasonable means must be honored within 10 business days (Kelley Drye; Burr & Forman).
- Testimonials (everyone). The FTC's August 2024 rule bans fake, bought and undisclosed insider reviews (Morgan Lewis, August 26, 2024).

Step 5: How do you test creative in 14 days?

Run three hooks across two formats, keep the offer, audience and form fixed, and judge on booked appointments. The hook, the first line or first two seconds, is usually your biggest lever.

	Short video, talking to camera	Single image with text
Hook 1: the problem in the prospect's words
Hook 2: what happens at the appointment
Hook 3: a common mistake or myth

- [ ] Days 1–7: Launch all six and leave them alone. Pause early only if an ad spends well past your target with zero leads.
- [ ] Days 8–14: Compare booked appointments by ad. Pause clear losers, keep the top one or two.
- [ ] Day 15: Write down what you learned and change one thing for the next round.

Cost per booked appointment decides. Cost per lead and click-through rate only help you diagnose.

Step 6: What happens after someone fills out the form?

Call every lead within minutes and track each one to a result. This decides more than any ad does. In a Harvard Business Review data set of 1.25 million leads, firms that made contact within an hour were nearly seven times as likely to qualify the lead as firms that waited longer (HBR, March 2011).

Let automation send the confirmation text. A person should make the call.

Date	Name	Ad or hook	Minutes to call	Reached?	Booked?	Held?	Won?	Value

Each week, divide spend by booked appointments and compare it to your Step 1 ceiling.

- [ ] Name who owns new leads at every hour you advertise
- [ ] Add an "ad or hook" field to every lead record

Where do most owners get stuck?

> Sending CRM outcomes back to Meta correctly. Meta's Conversions API can learn from "booked" and "held" events, but only if lead IDs match, timing is right and nothing sensitive goes along. Get it wrong and Meta learns the wrong lesson.

> Making enough creative to beat fatigue. Winning ads wear out. Most small teams run out of time for new hooks before the campaign runs out of steam.

> Covering the phone after hours. Homeowners fill out forms at night and on weekends. Reaching them within minutes is a staffing and routing problem before it's a marketing one.
